Excerpt from Educational Review, Vol. 42 And finally, the nature of the universities 2 must be studied in the same way. They, too, were just then being reformed by the establishment of various new ones, conspicuously Berlin. The university is also, abstractly conceived, an institution for the dissemination of universal education, for it rests on the conviction that one can not grasp knowledge from an isolated point, but that all the parts of knowledge form an organic whole, and that he alone thinks in a really scientific way who passes judgment upon every individual phase of knowledge from the standpoint of its relation to the whole. It is for this reason that philosophy is looked upon as the great framework of all sciences. The faculty of philosophy becomes, therefore, the most important, and the three higher faculties are safe from the danger of seeming mere technical schools only in so far as they remain in very close touch with the genuine scientific output of the fourth or research faculty. So just as Pestalozzi and Neohumanism strove after an ideal of...
