Createspace, United States, 2013. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . In Holographic Memoirs of a Dream: the Invention of Tram Hopping fiction and non-fiction consolidate in the author s aimed and obtained doctor s dissertation in theology: the author s contribution to the academic world is an autobiography cast in and through a hologram. The story is a Tram hopping (like island hopping on the Greek Islands), and for the reader a virtual Tram hopping with the author. It s something like playing a computer game, or watching a blockbuster film, revelling in the emotions and hormonal ride of the (Hyper)Real. Differently put, Holographic Memoirs of a Dream: the Invention of Tram Hopping is also an academic novel, since in postmodernism fiction is also non-fiction, and vice versa. It s a multidimensional hologram, eliciting a time-space quantum physical warping between dimensions where academic jargon can be curbed if needed, and thus puts forward a sphere of leisure for everyone, like any good museum or exhibition targets both laity and specialists. The hologram evokes a touristic exhibition where the one, like the serious academic endeavourer, can either read everything on each label, like in a museum and in this case all endnotes and biographical instances, or the laity that just wants to look at the thematic arrangement of objects on display, like in a museum, and just gather general impressions and in this case just enjoy the Tram hopping. The hologram is like an hourglass: while the top chamber runs empty the bottom chamber fills up. Chapters 7-8 are the climax and the neck between the chambers. Chapter 8 is the author s testimony of how he got pulled into the presence of God s Shekinah glory. His testimony shares how he first got...
